A Treasure of the War.

When Johnston was falling back before Sherman's advance through Northern Georgia, and before the conflicts at Lost and Pine Mountains, conflicts at Lost and Fine Mountains, I was continually on the front with a band of scouts. We penetrated the Yankee lines time after time, but always to return to headquarters with the same report. Sherman had one of the grandest armies in the world, and he was in such strength that he could fight Johnston in front and could fight Johnston in front and pass his flanks at the same time.

One day, when scouting between Marietta and the Etowah Riyer, the Federal cayalry passed and cut off my retreat by the highways, and for six or seven hours I was obliged to secrete myself in a thicket. It was in leaving this hiding place that I came across a dog which was doubtless owned in the near vicinity, but had been frightened into the woods by the skirmishing. He took to me kindly, and had dogged my heels for half an hour when he suddenly leaped aside and began pawing the ground at the foot of a large beach. I halted for a moment and saw that the carth for a moment and saw that the earth was fresh as if a grave had been dug. I was then a detective in the employ of several railroad lines, and it was only natural for me to ask myself why this man had lied to me. I took pains to let him know that I was willing to answer all hus questions, and directly he began asking about the section of country between Marietta and the Etowah. He wanted to know the value of land; if much forest had been any finds of treasure around Marietta, and various other things. He worked the answers out of me without seeming to be more than generally interested, and while I was generally interested in the employ interest and the forematic near the forematic nea

When we reached Marietta both of us went to the same hotel. I thought he began to fight shy of me and I took pains to keep out of his way. Durin the evening he asked several townspeople in regard to the country north of Marietta, and engaged of a livery man a saddle-horse for next day. I did a heap of thinking that night over the stranger's case, but when morning came I was none the wiser for it. His horse was brought around after breakfast and he rode off. I was tempted to get another and follow the cap on his head, brought out the but he what right? What had the stranger's case, but when morning came I was none the wiser for it. His horse was brought around after breakfast and he rode off. I was tempted to get another and follow him, but by what right? What had he done or what was he going to do? I went up to my room on an errand, not yet decided whether to go or stay and in the hallway my foot struck a memorandum book. I carried it into my room, and the first thing my drummer straightened himself up cover. "George Pales" it is and made the sticks fiv. cover, "George Palge." It was a well-worn book, and nearly full of entries.

Most of them seemed to relate to trips between Boston and Providence, but near the back end I found on reading: sounded the drum, and the veteran

Meanwhile I had engaged a horse and wagon, borrowed an empty tea-chest and a spade, and, as Paige went to jail, I drove out of town. I wanted to unearth that skeleton myself.

It was six years since I had left it, but I had but little difficulty in finding the grave, although the beech tree had been cut down. Indeed, I walked almost straight to it, and though the initials were indistinct, they were there as witnesses. In half an hour I had unearthed the "corpse."

By and by I made a careful flusiasm that comes from waving flags, tramping columns and crash of examination of his boots. He never bought them south of the Ohio. In fact I was reminded of without seeming to be more than generally interested, and while I was somehow suspicious of him, I could not exactly determine on what to place my finger. But he had lied. Why? I kept asking myself this question, but could not answer it.

He had a ticket to Cartersville, and before we reached that place I had made up my mind to go on with him to Marietta. What decided me was this: He sat on the outside of the seat and a passenger going to the water-cooler knocked his hat off.
